Oh look. Another anti-Socialist thread courtesy of user EAWTVet3.

#1 -- Europe is not Socialist. I got into a debate with someone the other day, because he said that Socialism lacks a definition. Well, if you're reading this, then here's a bright, shining example of how people perpetuate wrong information.

#2 -- In a socialist society, private property is abolished, therefore living space actually grows, because you're no longer restricted by other people's ownership.

The USA has a population density of 89 people per square mile. The UK has a population density of 673 people per square mile. Germany has a pop density of 583/sq mile. France has 303/sq mile. Sweden has 60 (but the northern part of the country is largely uninhabited).

Not to mention British, German, French and Swedish cities and urban centers have been developing for 1000+ years but in the USA for only a handful of centuries.

Because the USA is an underdeveloped country lacking serious infrastructure in the majority of the country.

The more infrastructure is around, the more expensive land gets.

My grandma has glass fiber internet that would make an American citydweller drool.

And she lives on a farm. Outside a little village.

comparisons of "net worth" aren't very good because most of it is tied up in house prices for the majority of people and this wealth is obviously not liquid at all. a better measure is financial wealth.

Not necessarily, housing is directly useable rather than have stacks of cash randomly lying about. Also taxi companies + bed & breakfasts, first world proletarians are capitalists etc

You have a point pan.

I don't think any system should be justified on economic grounds, only to the degree that it supports traditional hierarchies against liberal capitalism (which is why Spengler supported the USSR and Hitler)

1) Europe had its own housing boom as well which was no less severe, the world economy is just heavily dependent on the US. 2) Keynesians did predict the housing boom, in fact they were glad that it happened.

1) europe is not a single entity. id have thought that the fact that the eu is more dysfunctional than the american congress would make this obvious.
2) they did predict it but they werent keynesians they were economists. keynes is like any other scientist. newton got some things right but needed einstein to build and polish the complicated bits. einstein himself famously claimed that "god dosent play dice" which the entire field of quantum mechanics has pretty much proved wrong. this is the nature of science. just because the guys you see on your tv are faggots dosent mean economics is less of a science. and no, economists were not "happy" it happened. people were glad that it didnt take longer to happen because it would have been subjectively worse the more it was delayed. as economists these people were neither happy nor sad, science is amoral, merely a description and not a goal. you dont ask a physicist if gravity is right or wrong do you?

trade and budget surpluses would beg to disagree. also we didnt allocate a bunch of resources to providing floor space for those who couldnt afford it. when we, via our welfare state, give someone something they cant pay for we note it as a cost. this means we can balance our books. we dont give someone a house they cant pay for and pretend they can. lending money to someone who cant repay it is not an investment. by noting that we are giving money to people we at least have an honest book keeping. your "investments" are no more likely to pay back their loan than our welfare recipients. less actually.

not really. you just say it a lot. i honestly mean no offense but "freedom" in america is a total crapshoot. you just keep repeating the word and assume that lower taxes than some parts of europe as well as having guns means that you are free. americans saying that they are free-er honestly chimes false when struck by reality.

But that's just rhetorical blather. Have you ever been to Germany? Not just as a tourist, as an exchange student or something where you had to get by on a somewhat realistic income?

When you rent an apartment in Germany, you literally a get a room. One room, a few sockets and a bathroom. No appliances, furnishings, anything like that- you need to buy all those extra at 25% VAT and exorbitant prices. The kind of things Americans take for granted- TVs, computers, cars, washing machines- these are normal to not have in the rest of the world.

The GDP figures don't tell the whole story. Welfare states are really, really poor. You don't even know what you have until you lose it.

im swedish, im pretty sure i know what a welfare state looks like. i wont speak for germany but aside from cars (our leadership dislikes oil addiction) none of what you speak of is hard to acquire. my freedom of speech is also far more protected than yours. also who in our generation uses a tv these days? im not trying to be a dick but my government will gladly pay much of my rent ect. as i study. we used to pay for exchange students too but the fact that we were paying for our own people in their countries and paying for their people in our country left a slightly sour taste so it was discontinued. in general though americas debt/gdp is higher than that of india. this means you have a bunch of stuff you havent actually paid for, and that is just federal debt.

What a random point that is. The debt is simply an accounting mechanism, a country that issues its own currency can cover its own liabilities. Sweden has only a little bit less debt anyway. They have a balanced budget amendment which was a good move.

I'm not saying Germany is utterly third world. I'm saying that goods that virtually everyone has in the US are unaffordable for many and sometimes most people in other "developed" countries.

fair enough. the india thing was a bit random. however i have lived in the usa and even in wealthy neighborhoods many live worse in big houses with lots of plastic crap than even poor people live here. its not some sort of "what is happiness" philosophical bullshit . i lived on the same street in the same type of house as a congressman and it was more shoddy than the country house im now sitting in. my teacher bought colored paper with her own $$$ because the school, one of the best in the nation apparently, didnt cover that. floor area in something that is barely built properly dosent impress me. nor does the "stuff" americans have, and honestly, i know plenty of your countrymen who are in the 1% if not far further. again, its not some sort of philosophical "you can be happy with just a sleeping mat and a broom" its the fact that a poorly built house is full of crappily built shit that someone might even have taken a loan to buy. and thats the rich people. again, not trying to insult, but a swedis kr would buy much more in america than in sweden. the norwegians have oil so with one of their coins you could just go crazy. i also doubt germany is very impressed.

This is true because of the QE bullshit. But the purchasing power of the kronor in Sweden is probably not that great because prices are so high.

I can't say anything about the clueless congressman you ran into but what exactly was so shoddy about it? If you mean it was poorly repaired, then that's the owner's fault, cracks and smellyness only happen if you don't do maintenance. I'll give you that nothing I bought in Europe was particularly poorly made or unreliable, but that doesn't justify its mad price, I can't even image how the locals are able to get by on the cost of living.

its not the QE its that america dosent produce enough goods and services to swap for the goods and services of other places. as for the houses; it wasnt that they were in a state of disrepair it was that they were poorly built from the beginning. you guys (and we when we lived there) just burn more oil in the basement instead of building proper structures. i remember my father (who has lived in america several times) finally getting the epiphany as to why disney films are full of icicles. basically the isolation is poor so in america you increase the heat which melts the snow and then it freezes into icicles. i really not trying to offend but im intimatley familiar with how the wealthy live in your country and i really am not impressed. i shudder to think how the poor live.

The insulation you mean? The US doesn't have the environmentalist gimmick going. We don't care about heating costs. Unlike in Sweden or whatnot we can afford utilities.

I'm not offended. From my experience the typical German apartment is something out of an inner city ghetto in the US. Everyone drives tiny ten year old cars and lives in microscopic apartments. Shops are full of goods people aren't buying.

A soda can costs like 3 euros and your salary is like 1,500 a month. And you get thoroughly taxed on that. Entertainment, electronics, all that is pricey, eating out is impossible... it's just so much different.

It's not bad, I guess, it just could be better.

>> Phineas Pittcocke - Sat, 22 Jun 2013 23:30:22 EST ID:Q66MnYsV No.293098

yup, its the insulation. and we can easily afford it too currently but with an eye towards the future we dont consider it sustainable. tbh its mostly hippie greens who have driven this policy but i guess i should be happy regardless. 3 euros is a ridiculous price for a soda and if you payed that you got screwed. however paying the actual price for the material, physical mass and labor to create a product is how economics should work. the fact that eating out is expensive (and probably more so here in sweden) is because the waiters/waitresses get paid properly and over here get paternal leave and stuff. having what amounts to a slave class like what you have in america makes things much cheaper be they american, mexican or chinese. what you should worry about is not that but the inefficient allocation of resources.

We're speaking in relative terms. Maybe over the past few years it has taken a turn for welfarism but for most of the time since about 1960 there has been a divide between US free market policies and European welfarist ones.

Saying that fewer people owned homes in Europe wasn't the ridiculous part, the argument that he was supporting and the image that he was promoting were ridiculous.

Saying that a population is more or less wealthy or well off based on the sizes of their homes is silly.

The welfare state attempts to remedy the symptoms of Capitalism.

If you had a goldfish in a bowl and the goldfish became sick because it's water was dirty, what would you do? Would you give the gold-fish medicine or would you change the water?

Liberals will say "Give it medicine!", Leftists will say "Change the water!". Capitalism is the dirty water, making the fish sick.

With that being said, with the obliteration of Capitalism not yet on the horizon, is it wrong to ease the suffering? If you cannot change the water of the fish immediately, is it wrong to give him medicine in the meantime, until you can change the water? I don't think so. Humanity and compassion should remain intact during the transition from one system over to another.

Yea, except that I've been living here for 20+ years and have NEVER seen that. Not even with immigrants on welfare, or students, or whatever. Apartments usually come with a working kitchen and you're supposed to bring the rest, which most people can afford. Renting places without furniture is a cultural thing, not a poverty issue. We just like to bring our own stuff.

I live in partially subsidized housing because I'm -really- low income. This is literally one of the cheapest places you can live in in my city. It came with a new kitchen and stove, we brought the washing machine and the dishwasher. There's dryers and washing machines in the basement that everyone can use, but it's more convenient to have your own washing machine. I have a shiny new gaming computer with cheap high-speed internet access. The only thing missing is a car. But I doubt I could afford that in the US while in college and working a part-time job and public transportation gets me places. My income is around 600 euros/month, I have all my needs taken care of (including health insurance) and I'm going to finish my degree without significant debt.

I'm poor as fuck by income but still live way better than poor Americans. Not having a car and living in a relatively small place sounds a shitload better than no here have been numerous press reports about the expansion of micro housing, and expectations that Americans will be reducing the size of their houses. As the nation trepidatiously seeks to emerge from the deepest economic decline since the 1930s, normalcy seems to be returning to house sizes.

<http://news.heartland.org/newspaper-article/2013/06/19/median-house-size-us-hits-record-high>

According to the latest new single-family house size data from the U.S. Census Bureau, the median house size rose to an all-time record of 2,306 square feet in 2012. This is slightly above the 2,277 square feet median that was reached at the height of the housing bubble in 2007. The average new house size (2,505 square feet) remains slightly below the 2007 peak of 2,521 square feet.

I'm fairly sure that more rural areas don't do apartments. It's pretty much all larger houses. Are you pulling this out of your ass? Americans live in what's basically wooden sheds, there's a reason why houses in Europe are so expensive - BETTER quality, durability, energy efficiency and so forth. And they don't burn down whenever someone thinks it'd be fun to light the tap water on fire.

Wooden sheds with plumbing, electricity and all the things you need. Okay. The key word here is wooden. Bricks or concrete ore better in pretty much every aspect, but also more expensive.Inferior but cheaper material -> people can afford to build larger houses for the same amount of money, with quality (resistance to the elements, durability, insulation) as a tradeoff.

the idea being that it dosent. if you add what is payed for by the welfare state you would see a much higher income. similarly if you subtract what the government would cover in certain welfare states from the average american paycheck you would find that the poor of e.g. sweden could by more hamburgers than the lower middle class of the usa.

That's a pretty big leap from "uh' houses are bigger". Rich people still own villas, private planes, fancy vacation homes and go golfing. Middle-class people buy a nice car, or a boat, or a motorcycle, or a second house or whatever. People on welfare still buy flatscreen TVs, but they don't become homeless as often. Where's that massive poverty or lack of quality of life you're talking about?

" the average household net-adjusted disposable income (in Sweden) is 26 242 USD"

The average American can make about $27,000 a year on welfare, which is already greater than the household income of the average person in Sweden. Although America spends a lower fraction of its economy on welfare, this comes out to more overall spending because it has a stronger economy.

Disposable income has almost nothing to do with tax. It's what's left over after you pay for essentials (housing and grocery under most systems, some US stats also include transportation). Most Americans pay 35-50% of their income for housing alone, and another 15%+ for food. Even if we take the stats at the lowest end, that's still only half as much disposable income than the Swedish statistic, and in most cases, several thousand dollars less. Net income and disposable income is an apples-to-oranges comparison.

Same class gets less of quality of life in an European welfare state than in USA more straight-up capitalist one.

Despite the fact that the whole and only point of a welfare state is to give the lowest classes better quality of life...

You can't beat numbers. One minus one is always zero. Europe spends billions to just straight give out money to the poor, who "waste" it. USA uses the same billions to provide people with ideas or initiatives to start their own businesses instead. They start their own businesses, the businesses turn the money into more money, the entire country gets richer and as such even the lowest classes benefit by proxy.

As evidenced by multiple links, charts in this thread that you're going to ignore, just like this post, because it doesn't fit your neat little denialist worldview.

Yeah, they waste their money on products. They waste their money by spending money in the economy.

They spend that money on products produced by people with ideas and their own businesses. Those businesses turn that money into more money, the country gets richer, and the poor people can get more money from the government to put into the economy and the companies will get more money from the poor people, and they'll pay taxes and the government will give more money to the poor people and they'll pay for more goods and services and companies will get more money...

You don't get it.

It's not about the money.

It's about who does it. Kids in primary school in Europe hear about the LHC, and they will want to become scientists.

Kids in the USA learn about the LHC in highschool and don't give a shit.

If that thing was in the USA, Americans would be proud of it.

It's not about spending money in science, it's about PEOPLE STUDYING SCIENCE!

The amount of Americans studying sciences is dropping, they're all doing Liberal Arts or Economy bullshit. The only reason why SiliconValley hasn't collapsed is because the USA imports smart people from the underdeveloped countries.

Let me tell you guys, all of you, about the glory of the socialist/capitalist country of Denmark

- > Virtually all houses are built in bricks with increasingly sharp rules on insulation to make us ever-the-more energy independent. This gives them durability (many many houses are older than 60 years, and can still be retrofitted with new types of insulation, windows, flooring, boiler upgrades or connections to remote warm water from the power-plants)
- > Regardless of what illness you have, you will get help. Of course the system has flaws. Of course there are niche diseases that cannot be treated without bringing in private hospitals or a trip to China for new stem-cell tech and so on. While you are ill you will, to an extent, get disability money, especially if you are in a union, then you will get something close to a full salary for a couple of years.
- > We have disability pensions, but to many have tried to leech off it and they have tightened the grip so it has become quite hard to leave the work-market compared to 5 years ago (as it should, keeping people working for longer is a good thing)
- > Labour laws: our workers are much better protected, much happier, productive and last longer due to the welfare system as well as app 80-90% of the working force in unions, making sure it's the workers (consumers) who get the money and not so much the owners and leaders (although they still earn much more than a man on the floor)
- > Free Education and financial support for said education up to and including 5 year university. With lot's of state-paid PHD's as well
- > The LEAST UNEQUAL COUNTRY IN THE WORLD
- > The NEXT SAFEST COUNTRY IN THE WORLD (After Iceland)
- > A highly educated, well-trained workforce, that still manages to attract foreign investment
- > A fairly low company tax and no corruption adds to investor interests as well
- > In the wage laws we have 25 days of paid vacation every year. Many companies give 5 days extra (mine for instance)

I have a semi-low wage (just above minimum) and I have something like 1700-1800 dollars each month after taxes, with roughly a third of that going to housing and the rest for "fun". A whole month of paid vacation every year on top of some 10'odd national holidays that either gives me extra pay of for which I get to go home and enjoy life.

I know that if I were in the top 20-30% in the US I would in some ways be better off. I would also weigh 20 kilos more, and any kind of injury or illness could financially ruin my life even if I had an insurance. Saw a documentary about a woman who has spent more than 200.000 dollars because of a complicated broken foot. A broken foot.... That amount is more than I pay in taxes over ten years...

Denmark guy here

There is something seriously wrong with you guys and your numbers: in other threads, on other discussion boards, on television and in the newspapers I can read that in some states the minimum wage is something like 5-7 dollars an hour. Which is like a third of Danish union's minimum wage. I phrased it wrongly when I said there were laws about wage, there are not, the unions negotiate wages with the employers.

I don't have children, if I had, I would get a fuckton of goverment spending of course: Doctor checkups, vaccinations for the children, economic assistance for daycare and later on for freetimeclub (where youngsters get to hang out after school until they reach 13-15 years of age) I would get support for my rent to a certain extent. Actually, I do believe that I have the right to apply for some finansial support, like some 100 dollars a month, for my rent, but I prefer not to as I am not a leech. Most would of course.... I wouldn't have to spend so much on taxes either. Also, I would get something like.... 300-400 dollars depending on the exchange rate every three months in børnecheck (children's check). More children would mean less money for the goverment to prevent immigrants from breeding for money.

Also, one of the reasons why the life expectancy is lower in Denmark is that we drink and smoke a lot, compared to the US.

Another thing I do not understand, is how reliable those numbers can be.. In Denmark we have registrated every person in a central database, and everyone have their own number in this system. In the US you can be born, live and die without ever being registrated. Hell, illegal immigrants can go to school and highschool and college without ever being citizens! How can you guys pretend that any statistic is valid when your country is, by definition, impossible to make statistics about?

Also, cancer rates: Because of the private medicinal and hospital industry, there is an interest in diagnosing cancer diseases earlier even when they might just be harmless cysts. This artificially raises the cancer survival rates while raking in money. No link though... Someone here might have it.

Also, a good thing about Denmark is that it isn't a police state: say hello to your drones

>Which is like a third of Danish union's minimum wage.

But that's drowned out by the cost of living. Euros have such a severe housing and goods shortage that prices are ridiculous.

Cost of living comparisons still don't take into account the better variety and quality of goods in the US but they give an idea how bad it is.

http://www.numbeo.com/cost-of-living/compare_countries_result.jsp?country1=United+States&country2=Denmark

Consumer Prices in Denmark are 45.04% higher than in United States

Consumer Prices Including Rent in Denmark are 34.70% higher than in United States

Rent Prices in Denmark are 10.62% higher than in United States

Restaurant Prices in Denmark are 91.00% higher than in United States

Groceries Prices in Denmark are 23.33% higher than in United States

Local Purchasing Power in Denmark is 22.27% lower than in United States

Rent is actually about the same in both countries. It's more the overall cost of living is lower, because we're not a semi-socialist basketcase shortage economy.

Could you people please stop edging this bafoon? He's just as history-less as all of his cap-friends, completely forgetting the fact that Europe and her industries were nigh-obiterated during the last continental war. The USA emerged as the sole industrial nation completely unscathed, with a booming economy thanks to the ind-mil complex birthed by that war. We've been struggling to catch up ever since, and the Iron Curtain partly instigated by the US itself didn't help. We've been doing a damned fine job though.

There's nothing inherently great with US economic philosophy, they were merely lucky enough to be on the right side of history. It really hurts when philistines like OP try to hijack history like that in order to support a morally bankrupt system.

So SHUT IT and GTFO, OP. You're trampling all over the graves of the fallen British, American, German, Polish, French, Russian, Jewish etc who spilled their blood so that you could undeserved grow fat in your huge house and drive around in your fucking 4-track SUV while munching your weak-ass burgers and watching Jersey Shore like the drone you are.

By the way, while we're discussing "minimum wages" in Denmark, those aren't true minimum wages. Those are collective bargaining wages for unionized workers. The US has an actual minimum wage of $7.25 an hour (higher in some states) and only absolute, no experience, entry level workers make that. And you also have to consider that most Americans pay no net taxes, in fact it's quite a meme here that 47% of us receive net transfers from the government.

>The Danish Annual Median Income after taxes is 22,000 USD or 16,258 EUR.

$22,000. That's a burger flipper's income in the US.

It's still less than what some waiters make.

The other thing is, the high minimum wages in Euro countries aren't just a barebones floor like they are in the US. They're a significant chunk of the typical income.

- The "minimum wage" posted in this thread is the salary of a corporate executive in Denmark

Lets take some others: University graduate (master or PhD): start 30-35000 - late in life - 60000-70000 DKK/month. Medical doctors and lawyers ends up higher - or some do.

School teacher start approx 25000 - end 35000. Skilled (3 yrs education) worker (engineer in many countries): DKK 25000 and UP - all are/month before tax - after those pensions that are "by law".

The balance of power has more to say when it comes to economy. The US was the only western nation with any real bargaining chips after the war, and was thus able to set up a world order that benefitted themselves. While we're at it, I'd like to point out that even the average wages in welfare states are partially artificial. Some wages are from the government taxing its own public employees, others go to unemployment transfers to deal with high joblessness in these countries. This is why the disposable income and actual consumption figures are even starker.

"In 2000, the United States had the lowest non-employment rate for 25- to 34-year-olds among countries with large, wealthy economies. By 2011, America had one of the highest youth non-employment rates compared to its peers, according to a New York Times op-ed by David Leonhardt, the paper's Washington bureau chief."

"And it doesn't seem like things will get better for America's young people any time soon. Demos found that the U.S. economy will have to create more than 4 million jobs before young adults will be employed at levels similar to those before the recession. In addition, 16.1 percent of Americans ages 18 to 29 were out of work in April, according to Generation Opportunity, a nonpartisan youth advocacy group. "

Actually, huffpost, only Germany has a lower rate, and that's because of the Euro and the fact that it never issued a "stimulus".

More stupid crap in this thread.

We've already established that the average (not the median) Danish household (not the individual) makes $25,000 disposable for year. With a 36% higher cost of living than the US, that's $19,000.

An American waiter, working full time $10/hour, would make $20k a year. And because they would certainly be part of "the 47%" that receives net transfers from the government, their disposable is higher.

There are some oil emirates and tax havens with higher standard of living than the US, but this "Europe isn't dirt poor third world" stuff has to stop.

Umm, you mean the 47% that pay no income tax? That'd make their disposable income equal to their income before taxes, but not higher. They still pay sales tax, taxes on gas and all that.

>>With a 36% higher cost of living than the US

Cost of living index doesn't take healthcare and education into account. Healthcare especially seems to take a good chunk out of US "disposable income", while Danes have much smaller health care costs to begin with and have already paid most of it in taxes when they receive theirs.

Hyperbole. They actually eat as well as any American. They're fat as fuck.

When comparing income you completely forgo the return of well-fare systems. In Norway we get virtually free health-care which becomes completely free if the nominal cost goes above around 350 USD per year which also count for psychiatric diagnoses, we get free higher education, child-support that'd make any foreigner drool, paid sick-leave, paid maternity and paternity leave which are the longest in the world, general money support if your income is low enough, support if you have debilitating disease, superior mass transit systems, as well as tasty and drinkable tap-water.

Clearer definition.

http://www.bea.gov/faq/index.cfm?faq_id=106

Disposable personal income is total personal income minus personal current taxes.

Personal current taxes is tax payments (net of refunds) that are made by persons and that are not chargeable to business expense and certain other payments by persons to government agencies (except government enterprises) that are treated like taxes.

Personal current taxes includes taxes on income, including realized net capital gains, and on personal property. Also included in personal taxes are personal licenses. Contributions for government social insurance are not included.

I still think you're making unfair arguments. You're thinking, but you miss the bigger picture for the small details and statistics. You're consecutively comparing a nation of over 300 million people to singular cases with under less than half of that, with much less diverse resources and economies, and much less geopolitical power. Do not make the mistake of seeing the EU as integrated economically as the US. For what the individual nations have, they're doing remarkably well. Most of them aren't even socialists.
